Omg your last fight with that Meruhiko was insane!
Omgosh right though, he is such a trip and it's so cute when he gets provoked
Oh, it's when a cute femboy dresses up like a girl and tries to fight you

I think that may be the intention?

I could be 100000% wrong cause i dont prefer the term either

But my guess is that, this side of the world is absolute dog shit in terms of actual respect for one another (hence why you fuck the loser after all) and Grim has always tried to push " How much can I make people cringe and feel like absolute hell while sending a message "

I never really trust the whole "I write these stories but that doesn't mean I support them", it feels really suspicious that considering everything that Grim has posted doesn't seem to condemn any of the topics, but rather fetishize them. I read these comics out of morbid curiosity, but now I'm starting to really see a pattern of "I wanna make comics about these topics for people to get off to but not get yelled at for doing so by making it complexing stories". I really should've stopped looking after they made "Addiction".

Had to repost my comment because I didn't have enough time to edit the previous one. I am a victim of child grooming and child sexual abuse. I find it despicable that you think I'd fetishize it. I specifically put Reth in a situation like that to expose pedophiles who create child porn and then claim it's to cope with being abused as a child. No legitimate therapist/psychologist would ever agree with that being a good thing to do to deal with what happened to one as a child. Multiple times throughout that comic I exposed what pedophiles do in this community. I showed the negative consequences of grooming a child without having to hold your hand and blatantly say this is wrong. It says something about your character that you may find it sexually titillating (fetishizing, as you say) while most normal individuals would see it for what it really is and be rightfully uncomfortable. They wouldn't even consider it to be something to jack off to. You, on the other hand, seem to find it fetishizing. The lady doth protest too much, methinks. If you need me to tell you something is wrong rather than helping you come to that natural conclusion, I think you need to find someone else's stories to read. I don't like telling a reader how they should think and feel. I like telling a story and encouraging a reader to think for themselves. If you choose not to think for yourself, or you have some skeletons in the closet, it makes sense to me that you may find that comic fetishizing the issue.

So you don't think people can write awful or problematic characters without it being glorifying? That exploring darker things in a clearly negative context means you fetishize and support them? It's called raising awareness haha.. and it's super messed up you think addiction was glorifying anything. Leto was always talking about how fucked up it made him feel to have that stuff happen and how Reth dumped him once he wasn't cute or young. How in the world do you see that as glorifying??

I'm so tired of that narrow minded point of view that if you write or explore themes, that you're supporting something, even when it's very clearly shown to be super negative, awful, an harmful to the people involved. That is what causes MORE problems because it makes people shy away from talking to and bringing light to these things and seeing how much these mentalities, POVs, and events can damage someone and society itself. I think these things need to be talked about and explored and quite frankly it's sad you can't see it as anything but positive and praise to post open condemnations of these things.

Ironically, it's the kind of people who claim to be against authoritarianism who go around telling people what they can and can't do in art.

So sadly true... They say people allowed to say and express whatever they want, unless those views contradict their own.

Interesting that you'd feel this way.

I've never gotten such a vibe from Grim's work at all. They regularly tackle dark and complex subjects with nuance, and don't treat the reader with condescension.

It seems to me that you're having a hard time separating events in the stories from some imagined viewpoint of the author.

Femboys are transphobic?

I don't know about specifically transphobic but the term trap is generally frowned upon nowadays. It's directly implying you're trying to trick someone into having sex with you by not being sincere about your gender. In the US there's something called a panic defense, a legal strategy which asks a jury to find that a victim's sexual orientation or gender identity is to blame for the defendant's violent reaction, including murder.

Ah, of course. The US legal system and bigotry ruins a fun porn trope -_-

It actually isn't just the US that has it... it was a legit defense in Australia as well up until a year ago.

Ah, so legal stuff ruins a fun porn trope.

There's nothing quite like the femboy who pretends to be female

For people who are consenting, that's no issue.

But people have been murdered over it in the US and they've been legally protected.

I think this makes an interesting point about general warning signs of being too online.

Every community online has their own words, inside jokes, and even worldviews, which work great inside those communities, but once you start using those terms outside those communities, them you'll end up confusing people, alienating yourself, and then push yourself deeper into the original community.

I'm sure we have all been guilty of this at some point but even discounting this terms status as a slur, (Which to be clear, it is but I don't have a problem with it being used in this context because it's clearly being examined critically), it's emblematic of what can happen if you take those online terms into the real world.

Now, hear me out, Grim. The "losers have the chance to be sexually utilised" aspect, is perfectly fine, the whole psychic type situation is fine, "hmm, kinda sus" but when their already demonstrated world happens to resemble a real life contextual word, things fly off the handle?

I guess your comment said it best though. I am reading an unfolding story, I am learning about the mental state of a Nidoking. I am learning about his journey through varying situations that challenge his mental fortitude, and make him ask questions about himself that he would not have otherwise asked.

If one word took away from people seeing all that, I think they've missed the point overall. This is my two Poké.

I think one's propensity to have a strong emotional response aroused over the use of a single word that hasn't been demonstrably negative or positive in the context of the story says something about the intolerance of the person making the comment. In real life, cultures are not all the same. It is incredible that some people will castigate another based on what the person views as unacceptable, yet it being culturally acceptable in the other's country. Forcing one's culture unto another (forcing them to change their views on a practice or application of language) is attempting to destroy/change the culture to fit the individual's culture (this is somewhat reflected in what is happening to Tihi right now). To say "trap" shouldn't be used ignores that it may not be an offensive term in this world. To suggest a character should be punished for using the word (labeled as transphobic) because the reader finds it offensive is forcing one to conform a fictional culture to the standards of the reader's perceived culture, thus demanding a forced change of a culture--even though it is fictitious--and a dangerous policing of artistic exploration and discussion.

the discourse following this page is a lot to take in ultimately i think using creepy terms (like trap) to describe a person works in the story if it's not going to be a celebrated and encouraging phrase to use but i also am not really one to try to comment on stories that are still being told , especially because i don't know what's going on, but i felt like i just at least needed to throw in my thoughts

i genuinely don't know where this story is going , i don't know what kind of point it wants to tell because despite what i've seen, it feels like it's yet to really get to the heart of it
